

artificial horizons, two barometers, several thermometers, telescopes, etc. In the meantime, the main company moved ahead.

On Monday, April 19, as they were camped and just finishing their noon meal, the horsemen, with a fine sense of the dramatic, came tearing into camp at full gallop and with such a whoop and clatter that almost every diarist made note of their arrival. These appear under the date.

Norton Jacob: "...here Porter Rockwell, Redden, J. C. Little, Thomas Brown, and another young man overtook us, having left Winter Quarters yesterday morning."

Appleton M. Harmon: "...Porter Rockwell, Redden, Little, Thomas Brown, and another young man arrived....I finished a roadometer and attached it to the wheel of a wagon."

Howard Egan: "...At 1:30 p.m. we stopped to feed near a bend in the river after traveling thirteen miles. While ~~here~~ there J Redding, Brother Little and Thomas Brown arrived from Winter Quarters and brought a number of letters for the brethren...."

Erastus Snow: "... O.P. Rockwell, Elder J. C. Little, and the notorious Tom Brown came up with us."³

The word notorious here gives the key to this man's name being not given in the records. On May 10, 1845, ^{in an attempted robbery} John Miller and his son-in-law, Mr. Lieza, were killed near Montrose, across the river from Nauvoo. William and Stephen Hodge, two Mormons, were apprehended and executed for the crime. The third participant, named as Tom Brown, escaped, and evidently hid himself in Nauvoo. Feeling on both sides of the river ran high, as conflicts between the Mormons and their had become more common, and the incident ~~gained~~ received wide publicity. The younger Hodge brother was still in his teens and signed his name with an X; the older one was in his early twenties. Their family tried to place first responsibility upon Tom Brown. So vocal did the older brother Irvin (spelled also Ervin) become and so bitter against the authorities that he was killed by unknown assassians on the streets of Nauvoo.⁴

Whether or not Brown was a Mormon at this time is not known, but he was on the official list of pioneers.

artificial horizons, two barometers, several thermometers, telescopes, etc. In the meantime, the main company moved ahead.

On Monday, April 19, as they were camped and just finishing their noon meal, the horsemen, with a fine sense of the dramatic, came tearing into camp at full gallop and with such a whoop and clatter that almost every diarist made note of their arrival. These appear under the date.

Norton Jacob: "...here Porter Rockwell, Redden, J. C. Little, Thomas Brown, and another young man overtook us, having left Winter Quarters yesterday morning."

Appleton M. Harmon: "...Porter Rockwell, Redden, Little, Thomas Brown, and another young man arrived....I finished a roadometer and attached it to the wheel of a wagon."

Howard Egan: "...At 1:30 p.m. we stopped to feed near a bend in the river after ~~travelling~~ thirteen miles. While ~~xxxx~~ there J Redding, Brother Little and Thomas Brown arrived from Winter Quarters and brought a number of letters for the brethren...."

Erastus Snow: "...O.P. Rockwell, Elder J. C. Little, and the notorious Tom Brown came up with us."

The word notorious ~~here~~ ^{provides} the key to this man's name being not given in the records. On May 10, 1845, ^{in an attempted robbery,} John Miller and his son-in-law, Mr. Lieza, were killed near Montrose, across the river from Nauvoo. William and Stephen Hodge, two Mormons, were apprehended and executed for the crime. The third participant, named as Tom Brown, escaped, and evidently hid himself in Nauvoo. Feeling on both sides of the river ran high, as conflicts between the Mormons and their had become more common, and the incident ~~gained~~ received wide publicity. The younger Hodge brother was still in his teens and signed his name with an X; the older one was in his early twenties. Their family tried to place first responsibility upon Tom Brown. So vocal did the older brother Irvin (spelled also Ervin) become and so bitter against the authorities that he was killed by unknown assassians on the streets of Nauvoo. ⁴

Whether or not Brown was a Mormon at this time is not known, but he was on the official list of pioneers.